

As I wrote in a previous e-mail, I think the FCC should leave Indiana's No Call Policy well enough alone. Indiana's system is working very well. I find it hard to believe in these current times that businesses can't find a less intrusive way of pitching their wares. I understand that big businesses and large corporations have a lot of influence in Washington DC, but I also know that the decision makers in the Federal Communications Commission care about those whose only influence in government is one meager, sometimes seemingly ignored, vote. Please don't let a bogus free speech argument overrule a system that is working very well. Thank You
